Acute kidney injury after exposure to oleander (Nymphoides peltata). Oleander is a genus of plants native to the Near East and Mediterranean, and widely naturalised elsewhere, where it is sometimes known as "wood anemone" or "touch-me-not" due to its ability to cause severe local irritation. Oleander's toxic effects in humans include cardiovascular and central nervous system involvement, myocardial infarction, pulmonary edema, respiratory depression and cardiac arrhythmias. This report describes two cases of acute kidney injury with no evidence of oleander exposure. The initial diagnosis in both cases was florid interstitial nephritis. In both cases, the diagnosis of oleander toxicity was made on serological testing for active oleander plant lectin IgE. Oleander can be mistaken for an external agent and it is important for the clinician to be aware of this complication. Allergic contact dermatitis of the finger caused by a reaction to a fragrance fixative on a dermatological lotion. A 66-year-old woman applied a topical lotion on the finger of a patient because of irritation of a cut on the finger. After 3 h, a vesicular erythema of her own finger occurred, followed by an itchy discoloration and swelling of the finger. A patch test was done with the lotion of the patient and the dermatological lotion used, and contact allergy to fragrance fixatives was demonstrated. The patient successfully received a steroid treatment for the dermatitis and the spread of the dermatitis. Q: Can anyone tell me why setuptools doesn't support binary packages in python2.7?
