Basic Most editing tools are set up to work with an active drawing. Tools like: the Move tool, the Select tool, the Draw tool, the Drafting Geometry tool, the Edit Geometry tool, the Lock and Unlock Geometry tool, the Angle and Arc tools, etc. are examples of tools with an active drawing. The drawing being edited is often referred to as the active drawing. Drawing windows and the canvas may or may not be active. The source format for a drawing is not always evident. For example, a drawing may be generated from a model in some XML/JSON/Plist format. This is often called a 'draft' or a 'template' as it does not include all the drawing attributes. A typical AutoCAD drawing is a text-based description of an object that has been generated from a 3D model. Traditional means to import or export drawings from another source. The Process Architecture uses all drawing APIs to create a drawing. These include: Create drawings from scratch Load or reopen an existing drawing or source drawing. Import a new or modified drawing from a model, or from another source. Export a drawing. Create a document from scratch. Creation Create drawings from scratch is a common and simple way to create a new drawing. The user starts by choosing a type of drawing. For example, the 2D orthographic drawing, or the 2D perspective drawing, etc. The user must specify a location for the drawing. To finish, the user must add features such as lines, circles, arcs, polylines, splines, text, palettes, views, snap settings, etc. Importing and exporting Importing drawings is a powerful way to load another drawing file into a current drawing. Typically, the importer allows the user to define a type of drawing that the drawing should be imported as. For example, the importer may allow a drawing from another CAD system (see also: 3D interchange file format) to be imported, a drawing from another drawing system to be imported, etc. Exporting a drawing is the reverse of importing. Exporting allows the drawing to be saved in a drawing format, such as an AutoCAD drawing or.dwg, or as an image (tiff, jpg, bmp, etc.) Imported drawings from another source will typically appear in a temporary drawing window. If that temporary window is already Under-investment in mental health research. A case study of the New Zealand National Health and Disability Research Council. This paper provides a case study of the New Zealand National Health and Disability Research Council's (NHDR) research portfolio to examine the NHDR's investment in mental health research. Following the experiences of the UK's National Institute of Health Research, the NHDR's mission was to make research activity consistent with its strategic goal of improving health outcomes and the social and economic well-being of New Zealanders. While mental health is a significant public health issue for New Zealand, this was one of the first areas in which funding was awarded. The NHDR's investment in mental health research was funded by two annual contributions from the Minister of Health and in part by the NHDR's administration of the National Health and Disability Research Grant Scheme. These funding sources have been stable over time and the grant scheme has remained successful. Funding research activities in mental health was important to the NHDR. However, the method of funding research was a challenge and the NHDR's administration of the grant scheme faced operational issues. These were addressed by the NHDR's increased focus on strategic planning, internal resource development and support services. This case study contributes to the literature by using a qualitative methodology to examine a New Zealand health research organisation and highlights the issues associated with researching mental health in a tertiary health setting.
