I had the opportunity to ask Sony's Mark Cerny a number of questions about the technology, in particular, what it's for and what it's not. Mark Cerny: "Everything is hyper-realistic. Everything is captured with motion capture. Anything that's going on with any part of the body of your player is captured, both with the head, the arms, the legs, any gameplay that's visible to the referee is captured. "So, a player's running animation, what they're doing in the penalty box, the ball is exchanged with the goalkeeper, how they're using their stick. All that's covered. The more real the player, the more real the game is." It's hyper-realistic... Anything that's going on with any part of the body of your player is captured, both with the head, the arms, the legs, any gameplay that's visible to the referee is captured." What does this do? "What we really need to do is capture how the real player would behave. That's our goal. "We know what the player does if they are suddenly tackled. We know what they would do if they have to step forward, we know what they would do if they have to shoot. We know what they do with their foot, how they would use their foot, how they would use their stick. "That's captured. Then we add physics to the game. And a lot of it involves player likeness. You can see in FIFA 18 that you could speed up or slow down the player. We didn't get it quite right. So when you slowed down the player, he was also slower. "So, we changed our way of doing it, which led to a better result. We're using that to see what's the next step in fidelity. "For example, we can improve the player's skin mechanics, improving an important aspect of player likeness and simulation. "It's also helping with equipment, shirts and boots. We needed to improve the physics of how you'd interact with equipment, such as how a player with no socks or a broken boot would behave. "We also used the data, collected the motion capture data of players running, to improve the movement of players as they run. FIFA 18 had a situation where, when you would run, your feet would kind of get stuck. We're correcting that.
