Right now I can check for the URL I'm requesting in the user's browser by doing this: `if (req.url !== '/') { // Redirect them to www.example.com res.redirect(''); }` And in the routes I put in a middleware that calls `res.redirect()`. Is there some way to do this by checking the current request URL in the server? I need this to better make sure that I'm not circumventing the protection offered by `www.example.com`. I would like to avoid having to check the URL in all my server functions. A: You can attach a middleware to the `app.use()` function in your server's listen method that checks for the url and redirects if it doesn't match. `app.use(function (req, res, next) { if (req.url !== '/' && req.url !== '/index.html') { res.redirect(''); } next(); });` `app.listen(3000, function () { console.log('Listening on port 3000'); });` You can add more conditions if you want to redirect only if it's on https. Semi-bionic receptor The semibionic receptor is a class of chemoreceptors found in a number of bacteria, including Bacillus subtilis and Vibrio cholerae, in which signal transduction occurs via the regulation of adenosine 3',5'-bisphosphate (cAMP) cyclic nucleotide signaling. In contrast to the cAMP receptor (CRAC), the semibionic receptor has no
