A system for using cash is usually, but not necessarily, a system in which customers pay for each transaction item with cash or an equivalent, such as a credit card. For convenience, this description will sometimes use the term "cash" as a generic term for "cash or equivalent." for convenience. It is generally expected that for each transaction a system provides a way of determining whether or not the customer is legally entitled to have the item and that the system permits the customer to pay for each transaction item. Systems that automatically deal with cash have long been known. In one kind, for example, a person is required to
