The effect of electroconvulsive therapy (ECT) on plasma levels of biogenic amines (norepinephrine, dopamine and serotonin) was investigated in 11 depressed patients. Plasma levels of catecholamines were unchanged. Plasma levels of serotonin decreased significantly in association with an ECT-related increase in the electroencephalogram seizure threshold. This effect lasted, at least for 5 days after ECT, and was closely associated with clinical improvement. There were no effects on plasma levels of dopamine. These data suggest that ECT-associated anticonvulsant activity affects the release of serotonin into the plasma.The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for suppressing high-frequency interference currents in a power system, and more specifically, to a self-cooled secondary rectifier circuit which employs a PIN diode. Computer power supply switching regulators inherently cause short-duration, high-frequency interference currents
