Cracking Adobe Photoshop is a bit more involved, but it can be done. First, you'll need to download a program called a keygen. This is a program that will generate a valid serial number for you, so that you can activate the full version of the software without having to pay for it. After the keygen is downloaded, run it and generate a valid serial number. Then, launch Adobe Photoshop and enter the serial number. You should now have a fully functional version of the software. Just remember, cracking software is illegal and punishable by law, so use it at your own risk.

The second week, I was taking almost 600-700 shots in raw per day. Most of these were in difficult lighting conditions, but at least I was getting the shots. By the time the third week rolled around, I was doing 3,600-3,800 shots per day. This was getting into peak shooting conditions. I couldn't have kept up this pace for very long. I'm sure it would have been possible, but I had to surrender. This works great, but the one thing keeping it from being even better is the lack of an external monitor. It's one thing to use software on the go, but it becomes quite another when you're trying to make changes to RAW files. I worked around this with the built-in iPad display. I also disabled the live previews so I could work faster. I strayed away from other features, like Lightroom. I just couldn't afford to lose so many precious ephemeral seconds. After settling into the workflow needed to bare Nikon D810 in low light situations, I wanted to see how easy it was to change settings. I'd get a great shot, take it back to my computer, change the color balance, and then go back into the iPad app. This was somewhat discouraging. It's been said many times that Apple isn't about to let other third party developers in on their iOS secrets. It's a shame. Nikon should do something about this. If Sony gets to share settings with its first-party RAW converter, then why not Nikon? As much as I love the iPad Pro, it can't completely replace my desktop setup. It's nice to be able to work from my couch, but it would be even nicer to be able to pull up a meaningful first-person experience. Simply put, this means that there needs to be more video capture on an iPad than just the built-in camera.
